MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

Many of you will have read PricewaterhouseCoopers' new monograph Educating for the Public Trust — The PricewaterhouseCoopers Position on Accounting Education (New York: PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP, March 2003), participated in PricewaterhouseCoopers' recent Educators' Conference Call, or logged on to the firm's webcast at www.pwcglobal.com/forfaculty. In each instance, PwC announces the position it has assumed on the 150-hour requirement for entry into the public accounting profession. The PwC view is that "the 150-hour requirement should remain but be changed to provide equivalent alternatives for meeting the requirement" (Educating for the Public Trust, p. 8). The proposed alternatives include requiring an additional year of practice (one more year than currently required) and recognizing continuing professional education in lieu of university coursework.

O. Finley Graves

The monograph also discusses a study PwC sponsored of nine benchmark accounting programs in the U.S., including their undergraduate and master's-level courses. The study compares accounting education in these programs with the continuing and professional education curriculum for new hires at PwC. The study concludes that while there is considerable overlap in the technical content of university and continuing education, there are vital areas in which university education falls short. These "gaps," as the authors of the study term the shortfalls, include providing new entrants with an understanding of what it means to be a professional; equipping them with the interpersonal and communications skills necessary to function as a professional; teaching them to problem-solve in ambiguous circumstances; and inculcating in them a commitment to continuous individual and collaborative learning. Indeed, the study finds that, with the exception of tax specialty programs, the overall contribution of master's degrees in accounting is unclear. The study concedes that some transformation in university education has taken place. But in the end the assessment of master's-level accounting education in the United States is damning — the implication is that it simply does not provide students with the interpersonal and analytical skills required of a professional.

PwC's assertions in the monograph about the need to educate students to serve the public trust are incontrovertible. The firm's call for university administrators to ensure the availability of a competent and well-educated accounting professoriate and as strong a commitment to accounting education as to MBA and other business programs is supportive. Its critique of master's-level accounting education in the United States, moreover, ought to provoke commentary about the purpose and best pedagogical practices for master's-level work in accounting for some time to come.

My concern is with the firm's proposed alternatives for the 150-hour requirement, which I believe are misguided. Certainly if our master's programs only provided students with more technical expertise, continuing professional education would be a viable alternative to university coursework. But if our master's programs do respond to the calls on the part of the profession itself for more broadly educated entrants into the profession, an additional year of experience and continuing professional education are no substitutes. My experience with firm-sponsored continuing professional education has been positive. I have learned how firms intended to implement new or highly technical accounting standards; I have improved my presentation skills; and, as a new staff accountant, I learned in detail one firm's way of doing things. And none of us would deny that on-the-job experience leads to business savvy. But continuing professional education is narrowly focused, and business savvy is about practical understanding. Given the pressures of keeping abreast of current technical developments on the job or just getting the job done, one seldom has the opportunity (or inclination) to consider the nature of accounting itself, theoretical alternatives to accepted accounting practices, the societal role of the accountant, or broader moral issues facing the profession. Nor does on-the-job training, whether in the form of continuing professional education or practical experience, allow for depth of exploration or ongoing discussion. The PwC monograph speaks of the big picture one gains through experience, the picture of how accounting interrelates with the other business disciplines. There is an even bigger picture that university education provides, the picture of the role accounting plays in society and of the potentialities of accounting beyond current convention. I would contend, accordingly, that master's-level education in accounting can produce the more broadly educated, multi-dimensional, and adaptable professional the profession and the nation's policy-makers had in mind when the 150-hour requirement was envisioned and adopted.

Finally, I might note that entrants into the profession already benefit from practical experience and already receive in-firm continuing professional education. To substitute for the 150-hour requirement what entrants already do is effectively to eliminate the 150-hour requirement. Yet it is the 150-hour requirement that adds another dimension to accounting education, not on-the-job training.

My arguments, however, do not dismiss PwC's critique of the content of current master's-level education in the United States. As educators, we must welcome critique, continually re-evaluate our programs, and take appropriate and timely action. Calls for change are already longstanding, dating to the 1980s and the Accounting Education Change Commission and extending through the Albrecht and Sack report (Albrecht, W. Steve and Robert J. Sack, Accounting Education: Charting the Course through a Perilous Future (Sarasota: American Accounting Association, 2000) and our own immediate Past President's last message to the FSA membership (Reckers, Philip. M.J., "Message from the President: Reflections on Our Times," FSA Newsletter (Fall 2002)). Many programs have responded to these calls. For others, the time is ripe.

At the conclusion of its monograph, PwC states its commitment to a continuing dialogue on the present and future of accounting education. I urge all of you to read the PwC monograph and to engage in conversations about its findings and proposals. Certainly the FSA is committed to providing a forum for discussion and debate about the need for innovation in accounting education.

FSA 2003 ANNUAL MEETING
OCTOBER 16–18, 2003

Hyatt Regency
Denver, CO

DATES AND LOCATION

We are preparing for the 2003 FSA 27th Annual Meeting that will begin with a welcome reception at 6:00 pm on Thursday, October 16, 2003, and continue on Friday and Saturday, October 17–18, 2003. The meeting will conclude at noon on Saturday. The FSA annual meetings are opportunities for renewing old friendships, making new friends, and sharing insights and experiences in delivering the very best accounting education.

The meeting will be held at the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Denver, CO. The Hyatt Regency Denver is located in the downtown business and entertainment district, within walking distance of Denver Center for the Performing Arts, Colorado Convention Center, historic Larimer Square, Coors Field, and the 16th Street Mall, Lower Downtown District (Lodo).

The theme for the 2003 FSA Annual Meeting is Challenges to Graduate Accounting Education. The program will include several sessions on accreditation matters, strategic evaluations of graduate accounting models, a variety of innovative graduate curricular models, and the need to prepare students to meet the changing requirements of the accounting profession.

MEETING AND REGISTRATION INFORMATION

In addition to Newsletters and e-mails, we will use our FSA's Web site, www.thefsa.org, to provide information for the 2003 Annual Meeting.

We look forward to seeing you at the 2003 FSA Annual Meeting! If you have any questions about the Annual Meeting, or any other FSA matters, please contact our FSA Administrator, Cecilia LoChin, at (212) 596-6165, or e-mail at clochin@aicpa.org.
